FRONT ROYAL LOCAL LEGEND

In Colonial days, a giant oak - the "royal" tree of England - stood in the public square where Chester and Main Streets now join. There, on Muster Days, was drilled the local militia, composed of raw recruits slow to learn military commands and maneuvers. On one occasion, the sorely tired drill sergeant became so exasperated by the clumsy efforts of his troops and their failure to follow his command that he hit upon a phrase all could understand and shouted: "Front the Royal Oak." Among the spectators was a Mr. Forsythe, who had been a professional soldier and was so amused by the officer's coined order that he and his friends found much sport in telling of the occurrence, repeating "Front the Royal Oak" until Front Royal was the resulting derivation.
